A famine afflicted Cappadocia in AD 368–69. The wealthy Christians had done this very thing: stored their crops. The poor were suffering as a result, so Basil preached from this text, appealing to the wealthy members of the congregation to be rich toward God. This was the second in a series of three sermons that appealed to the wealthy to open their storehouses to care for others. In his final sermon, he said,

Rather, the reason why our needs are not provided for as usual is plain and obvious: we do not share what we receive with others. We praise beneficence, while we deprive the needy of it .... Though we have a God who is generous and lacks nothing, we have become grudging and unsociable towards the poor .... Our storehouses groan with plenty, yet we have no mercy on those who groan with want. For this reason we are threatened with righteous judgment. This is why God does not open his hand: because we have closed up our hearts towards our brothers and sisters. This is why the fields are arid: because love has dried up.

They replied by opening their storehouses so that the needy were fed.

Jesus urges his disciples not to worry (12:22–34) but to always be ready (12:35–40). Next follows a parable about being responsible. Jesus likely says this, knowing he will leave them (12:41–48). The good news will be a point of division (12:49–53), which has already been. Jesus turns to the crowds and rebukes them for not knowing how to discern the times (12:54–56) and not settling issues with one another (12:57–59).

The idea that the presence of suffering coincides with sin is raised. Jesus, however, points out the universal question of human sinfulness from which no one is free. He urges repentance of all (13:1–5). God's judgment regarding fruitlessness is imminent and will be directed at Israel (13:6–9). Some time has passed, and Jesus is now in a synagogue on the Sabbath when he heals a woman to the indignation of those present. Yet, his reply puts all to shame (13:10–17). The next two parables speak to the gospel as a small movement that grows into something much bigger (13:18–21).

Roughing It

Following the organization of the Water Street church in 1909, the small group had no regular meeting place until 1912. In that year Abraham David Thompson (1859-1924), a Murray attorney, deeded a small lot on the northeast corner of Linn & Water Streets to the church in exchange for their paying off the $500 he still owed on the property.

The first service in the Linn & Water Street church building was held on Sunday, November 10, 1912. This building was still unfinished throughout the winter of 1912-1913.

The original structure had no basement, no classrooms, no indoor plumbing, no baptistry and no central heating. The structure consisted of one main meeting room measuring 49x35 feet. The pulpit was originally at the west end of the auditorium with the entrance on the east end and the only source of heat was a coal or wood stove.

By our standards, all this was primitive indeed but their focus wasn't on meting in an impressive structure. Like most congregations of that day, they were singularly focused not on things of this world but on things above. (Col 3:2 & 1 John 2)
